Central nervous system tuberculosis after recovery from tuberculosis. Central nervous system (CNS) tuberculosis is an important cause of morbidity and mortality in the era of HIV infection and multidrug resistance. We studied the clinical and laboratory characteristics of patients with CNS tuberculosis after successful treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis. Between January 1991 and December 1996, 48 patients with CNS tuberculosis were identified. Mean age was 31 years (range, 16 to 54 years), and 29 patients were female. Although 24 patients had HIV infection, no patient had symptoms of HIV infection. Thirty-three patients had complete recovery from pulmonary tuberculosis without antituberculous drugs. Neurological manifestations developed 3 to 56 months after the pulmonary tuberculosis. Three patients had newly diagnosed cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) tuberculosis and remained culture negative. Others had a negative CSF culture with positive culture of body fluids. There was no association between the time to recovery from pulmonary tuberculosis and the time to the development of CNS manifestations. Central nervous system tuberculosis developed in 20 patients, an annual incidence of 3.9 per 100,000 population. Three patients had a positive CSF culture, and all three had a negative culture of body fluids. Although the criteria for diagnosis of CNS tuberculosis are well established, these findings stress the need for systematic evaluation of all body fluids in order to diagnose CNS tuberculosis in patients with long-standing pulmonary tuberculosis.[Fatal acute poisoning by beta-lactam antibiotics: A contribution of toxicological analysis]. A case of acute intoxication by beta-lactam antibiotics is described. Clinical and toxicological investigations revealed presence of a recent injection of Tazobactam in the patient's system. Tazobactam is an injectable beta-lactam antibiotics that, to a greater extent than the other injectable beta-lactam, it was used due to its "added value" in the treatment of infections caused by beta-lactamase producing microorganisms. Due to the incidence of amoxicillin-clavulanic acid (amoxicilin plus clavulanic acid) association, a drug that has almost disappeared from the market of antibiotics, the authors decided to perform a toxicological analysis and they found presence of a dose of clavulanic acid
