What's New In?

MacBurner Screenshot: MacBurner Screenshot #2: A: I haven't found anything that will do this in OSX, but there is a way to do this in Windows. In Windows you can change your default filesystem to an NTFS filesystem, and you can then use a program like Nero 6 to do the actual burning. This is probably more of a symbolic link to the storage than an actual mounted volume, but it's a little safer, and you don't need to install additional software on the Mac side. Windows Setup Tutorial - How to Create and Mount a virtual hard drive using Disk Management A: Burning to an optical disc is a function of the application, not of the OS. Both OS X and Windows have optical disc burning software. There are also CD burning apps for iPhone and Android phone. You should be able to burn from one of those as well. The software may be proprietary or open source, it doesn't really matter from a functional perspective. If it's a proprietary application, this will usually be determined in the license agreement. If it's an open source application, typically you can see the license agreement on a webpage or in an archive file. Many free and open source operating system programs, if their license permits it, include CD burning functions. The best known open source CD burning apps are Gnomebaker and Brasero. The open source CD burning functions in Mac OS X are part of the OS's core components and don't require additional applications. Finally, if you have a company policy or requirement, it may be a Windows only application and be usable under OS X or it might be a different, proprietary product.
