The availability of digital radiographs provides new possibilities for evaluating chronic spine disease. However, certain difficulties arise with respect to the interpretation of radiographs obtained for alternative purposes. To assess the influence of the radiation dose and the presence of soft tissue oedema on the interpretation of focal erosions in the intervertebral disc. This retrospective study included a homogeneous series of 182 magnetic resonance imaging scans to be correlated with both digital radiographs and traditional photographs. Three observers, blinded to each other's readings, interpreted the radiographs and photographs independently. Bland-Altman analysis was carried out to assess interobserver agreement and the influence of the radiation dose and the presence of the oedema on the interobserver disagreement. A statistically significant, but rather low, level of agreement was observed between the three observers with regard to the digital radiographs, with a minimum value of 3e33713323
