But will the president have to be patient? Reuters Although the nation has been stalled on a $1.2 trillion deficit deal for the past five months, a continuing resolution to fund the federal government until the end of the year has been passed. The president has said he would accept a "grand bargain" compromise on the deficit, but Congressional Republicans in Congress have shown no interest, which could force the president to be patient. "The continuing resolution expires on Dec. 18, and the question is whether the president can wait until Feb. 16 to negotiate with Boehner on an overall deal that would forestall the need for a debt-limit increase and avert the first government default in history," writes Barney Frank, a former congressman from Massachusetts who now heads the political action committee, Common Cause. "It is not out of the question that Obama and Boehner could do a grand bargain on the floor of the House of Representatives with only Boehner and the president and no senators or leaders in the House majority to intervene. But I'm not sure where the House would stand on that." A grand bargain has the support of the Democratic and Republican leadership in Congress, but the presidents of both the Democratic and Republican organizations are not involved in the process. Republicans in Congress refuse to agree to a "grand bargain" because they want to balance the budget through a combination of tax increases and spending cuts. President Obama said he would be willing to consider a "grand bargain" on the deficit, but after the Democrats lost the House of Representatives last week, in their bloodiest midterm congressional defeat since the 1930s, a willingness to compromise may be in short supply. Obama's pollster, Joel Benenson, said the president was "frozen" on the budget deal for the past five months, as he was besieged with a long list of competing demands -- from the need for a continuing resolution to an extension 3e33713323
