Enjoy!Q: Django - multiple databases I have a fairly large project and some models extend from my other models. I currently use the models from the core app in all models. In the core app there are a lot of migration that have to be applied for some models so I would rather not have all the migrations in all the models. What is the proper way to approach this? Should I put all models in one database and let the core app deal with the migrations? Or should I create a separate database for each model? A: My suggestion would be to add another database to your Django project, that does not have any of your models, and use that for all your migrations. Django has the model inheritance built-in that will make sure that your migrations will be applied. However, you need to remember that every change in your models will be applied. That means that if you have some migrations that are not relevant to your models in that database, you might want to manually disable them. A: I would highly suggest to keep the migration in the core app. I have inherited a large project of over 200 models, with over 50 migrations, with 1 database (production). I'm sure there is a better solution, but I added a new database to the Django project and ran a migration to set the base models. I then updated the core app to use the core app's models and updated migrations. This has allowed me to remove all migrations for most models. This is the best way I've found to deal with situations like this, its one database so the database sync is fast, most models are in one place and less to maintain. From my experience its the best solution, not everything needs to be in one database, this is just the situation that I've encountered and have found to work best. kottke.org posts about redshift-rails
