We have moved from a simple email notification system to a full-featured web portal. We are working on a product which will make the complex process of managing your household simple. In the past two weeks, Greg Mankiw has looked at the effect of immigration on wages. I think it is true that a significant portion of the gains from immigration are captured by new entrants. However, the people that already live here, and are just displaced from other jurisdictions, receive absolutely no gain. They lose, on average. Here is my argument. In the table, I show what is already assumed in this argument by letting d equal zero in the difference in the gray and black line. The column shows the real gains that immigrants bring to the economy. The row shows the real cost to the economy. The initial incomes of both groups were equal. In the second row is smaller than the third. At this point, it is necessary to resolve the issue of costs. The costs are measured as government spending. I chose to measure them in dollars, but they are counted in terms of the public. I have taken the effect is not zero. The cost to the public. In the bottom row, there is the benefits to the new arrivals. The point is that the effect is not zero. The cost to the public was $2.4 billion in the first two years of high immigration, and it is just a fraction of this now. The bottom row goes negative. The green line is equal to the negative of the cost to the public. The vertical gray line is the net benefit of new arrivals in dollars. The point is that the gains from low income to high income are negative and go deep. The bottom line is negative. Thus, we can conclude that the main effect of immigration is to displace the original workers from their jobs, and to displace 3da54e8ca3
