listen to the wonderful stories of the imaginary city of Yaad Sheher told by me (Nilesh Mishra) at my award. Or a joke, or an easy example, or a certain thought with a hint, not entirely clear, but read with the same enthusiasm as if we were reading a general text.

Or a professional job that took time from lunch to dinner. Or some photo display. But before that, a crazy explanation of my presentation of a new book, and when dinner ends with his story, they fall asleep with laughter ... Of course, all this does not lead us to the arena, as we would like. Here we are so far away from the public that it is very difficult to maintain any contact with them. Once you get closer, it becomes completely impossible. My friend and colleague from this lecture, Hungarian scholar Florian Gui, says that reading books in Hungarian has fundamental differences between traditional and public speaking. If public speaking is more improvisational, then reading is more strictly regulated, although both are enough to be a literary work. Notwithstanding the foregoing, during lectures I use only reading and not copying. At the same time, reading, despite the fact that I did so, bears a significant imprint of improvisation, which is quite logical, because reading is a work for an imaginary reader who understands all these words as if by themselves. When I read, I never include sentences so that they appear immediately in my mind, I do not write them down and draw conclusions, I do not create contexts for them. It seems to me that when I start reading, I check my memory and find myself reading like a person who cannot remember something and says to me: "I think I read this twenty minutes ago." This is how it should be. Reading a book is creativity, and it is not something static. When we read about how great people wrote, we look for subtle changes and shifts in their writings that they did not notice. That is why, if they write about the same thing, it is quite similar. In my opinion, reading is the only way to get in close contact with the text and use it in such a way that it can respond to our inner events. How interesting it is to listen and read books! They are so alive and at the same time so fictional. Or if you read them a little differently
