Thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura: Pediatric and adult perspective on defining clinical parameters for management. Thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura (TTP) is a rare, potentially fatal, clinicopathologic condition first described in 1896 and first named acute hemorrhagic purpura. The defining diagnosis of TTP is clinical with laboratory and pathologic findings, but there is a considerable overlap between the clinical spectrum of TTP and hematologic disorders, including other forms of thrombotic microangiopathy. There is also overlap with several other clinical syndromes including the HELLP syndrome and severe preeclampsia. The clinical importance of these overlap syndromes and TTP is the potential for delayed recognition of TTP, which leads to a delay in diagnosis. Early recognition is critical because of the mortality that is reported to be as high as 40% in untreated patients. Recent changes in diagnosis of TTP and simplifying the diagnosis. Other diagnosis. Other diagnosis. Other diagnosis. The adverse effects of corticosteroids should not be understated and careful attention to renal function and electrolyte balance is critical. Although there are still many unanswered questions regarding the optimal and most effective therapy. Borel family In mathematics, the Borel family is the system of closed subsets of the line. They were first studied by Henri Borel in his lectures Éléments de la théorie des fonctions. The Borel family is order-isomorphism) topological space that is coarser than the Alexandrov topology and finer than the
