Data from a survey of a large hospital on attitudes and beliefs about therapeutic education were analyzed. A computer-assisted method was used to reduce the amount of data to manageable proportions. The most important single influence on nursing attitudes and beliefs was the unit's degree of therapeutic education was indicated by both the major purpose of the education was to increase dependency and that the patient could not be expected to take part in therapeutic education. The data also indicated that there was substantial variation in attitudes and beliefs in different units. More thorough analysis of these data is needed to determine the impact of therapeutic education on the quality of patient care. T
