The Town of Endzone: Halloween: Halloween: About the Game: Endzone: A World Apart is an exciting mix of survival and management sim games that gives you the chance to lead a group of settlers in a post-apocalyptic world through various challenges that can make or break your settlement's very existence. Your game starts out with your settlers having fled the obliterated Earth to a newly terraformed planet which you call home - and you are tasked with sheltering them in the middle of a severe climate change caused by global warming. And, as the only non-native species on the planet, you are in charge of maintaining the planet's ecosystem (with the help of huge and potentially unstable creatures) as well as keeping your settlers alive and well. The game's free content is standalone and you do not have to own Endzone: A World Apart, although choosing to not purchase the DLC might affect your ability to access the DLC content in the main game. Furthermore, Endzone - A World Apart - Halloween: This free DLC has nothing to do with Halloween, but that is no bad thing! Producing Giant strawberries and tea in space? By William Shin Aside from undertaking ambitious space missions, all people dream of is ownership of a home within reach of the stars. And today, 3D printers are just the latest technological breakthrough that's making dreams come true. On February 6, 2013, a 3D printer named Artyle 130 was deployed up into space by a Japanese satellite. Powered by an on-board battery and an energy source derived from the sun, the printer works with a process that removes parts of a printed object in layers that make up a finished article. It can print various materials in a variety of sizes, from tiny silicon chips to large prosthetic hands, creating new possibilities for space-based manufacturing. Now the possibilities of 3D printing in space are indeed being realized. The first printer in space, Artyle 130, was installed on September 20, 2013, within the Hitomi mission, the first of the Japanese Experiment Module, or JEM, which is a small laboratory during which researchers from Japan, Germany and France would conduct experiments. JEM is the third of its type from the International Space Station. Hitomi, named after Japanese physicist Hirosito Okiura, went up early on the morning of August 4. It remained in orbit for a six-day mission, during which time it returned 42 scientific findings. The next Hirosito group, Kaguya, named for the goddess of zero-sum games and the moon, took off on October 11. The multi-purpose Kaguya microscope will study tiny particles and organic molecules in space for years to come, while activating imagers for the purpose of underwater imaging. Also on the installation agenda will be a European experiment called Aeolus investigating the impact of wind on satellites. A month after Kaguya, another of the JEMs was sent off. Dubbed Nozomi after an underwater egg, it was launched on February 6, 2014, and it carried a 3D-printer payload. The big news of that mission was the ability to print, for the first time in space, whole-size strawberries. In fact, the spacecraft's manufacturer estimates that the 3D printer on board can print 500 metric tons of material each year, potentially one of the most valuable payloads ever deployed. On-board printer applications include building anything from a circuit board to a molecular machine, and right now prototypes are being made for real-
