To investigate the content of the vitreous cells in proliferative vitreoretinopathy (PVR) and the relationship with the membrane material of the retinal pigment epithelium (RPE) and their adhesion. The method of vitrectomy and the rate of aspiration were identical between the two groups. However, the posterior vitreous was removed in PVR group by a series of traction with a vitreous cutter after fluid-air exchange. The cell content was counted in the cell suspension samples obtained by vitrectomy. The membrane material was immunohistochemically stained for proliferating cell nuclear antigen (PCNA) and beta-catenin. Cell-like material that attached to the RPE was also examined for distribution of their adhesion molecules. In the RPE cell suspension, there were more leukocytes and fewer RPE cells than vitreous in PVR group ($P = 0.006$ and 0.007 , respectively), and the macrophage ratio was significantly higher ($P = 0.036$). In the retinal cell suspension, the RPE cells were more concentrated than vitreous in PVR group ($P = 0.001$). Although the concentration of vitreous cells in PVR group was higher than that in the control group ($P = 0.056$), the cell-like material attached to the RPE was not significantly increased. PVR causes or exacerbates vitreous inflammation and disturbs the RPE.Q: Any downsides of chaining to an object that implements operator
