This invention relates to an improved process for recovering sulfur from the residue obtained by the combustion of organic fuels, and more particularly to a process for recovering sulfur from the residue in a manner such that desulfurized coal is produced therefrom. As is well known, sulfur is an element of economic value in many industrial processes, and accordingly, the refining of petroleum and the burning of coal to produce energy inevitably involves the loss of sulfur. This is true even where the fuel is mixed with an oxygen-containing gas, such as air, to effect combustion. The sulfur from the fuel is lost in the form of particulate sulfur and/or sulfuric acid gas. The acid gas is in the form of sulfuric acid (H.sub.2 SO.sub.3), which may be recovered as an aqueous solution, or in the form of sulfur dioxide (SO.sub.2), which may be recovered as a gas. The desulfurization of fuels is an important commercial practice, particularly in the burning of coal. Two factors which are important in coal desulfurization are the amount of sulfur present and the sulfur content of the fuel before it is combusted. The presence of particulate sulfur in the fuel is detrimental because it readily passes from the combustion zone to the stack, and leaves coal handling equipment contaminated, thus resulting in equipment malfunction. The sulfur content of the fuel is also a factor, because only a limited amount of sulfuric acid may be absorbed in desulfurizing agents, and this amount must be sufficient to render the waste desulfurized. Accordingly, there is no point in exposing a desulfurizing agent to a low sulfur content fuel
