Semiconductor devices such as integrated circuits (ICs) are typically fabricated from semiconductor material, e.g., silicon, gallium arsenide, or other type of material. A variety of IC devices are fabricated within silicon wafers that are processed to produce ICs. The ICs are typically assembled into packages that are then mounted on printed circuit boards or other types of carrier substrates to form product or device circuits. Various packaging techniques are currently used to package IC devices. One of the most common techniques for packaging ICs is the use of a lead frame. Typically, lead frame packages use a die pad that supports the device being packaged, leads that provide a way to connect the packaged device to 0cc13bf012
