Lysophosphatidylcholine (LPC) is a key molecule in atherogenesis. In this study, we examined the effects of LPC on dermal fibroblasts from human skin and its possible mechanisms in vivo. LPC stimulated DNA synthesis and collagen synthesis of human skin fibroblasts in a concentration- and time-dependent manner. It did not induce proliferation of human skin fibroblasts in the absence of serum, but stimulated it in the presence of a lower serum concentration (0.1%). This stimulation was inhibited by the mitogen-activated protein kinase (MAPK) kinase (MEK) inhibitor PD098059 but not by the Rho-associated coiled-coil protein kinase (ROCK) inhibitor Y27632. LPC-induced mitogenic response was followed by an increase in the expression of cyclin D1 and cyclin-dependent kinase 4, which are involved in the G1/S transition. The LPC-induced mitogenic response was also accompanied by an increase in matrix metalloproteinases-1 and -3, which are responsible for collagen degradation. The possible involvement of LPC in atherogenesis was examined by the LPC-induced proliferation of human skin fibroblasts from atherosclerotic lesions. These cells showed a tendency toward an increase in the extent of proliferation, although the difference was not statistically significant. Taken together, these results provide evidence that LPC stimulates dermal fibroblasts to proliferate and increase collagen

Is there a way to find out which method in a class was overridden by using reflection? I would expect there to be something similar to the following code: var method = typeof(Class1).GetMethod("Method1") A: public override bool IsGenericMethodDefinition (MethodBase method) or MethodBase method = typeof(MyType).GetMethod("Method1"); Obviously the first should work for at least any method with the same name and arguments. As Josh suggests, you can also use the code above combined with Attribute.GetCustomAttributes to get all the method attributes associated with a method.
