The possible role of dietary factors in the causation of asthma has recently been highlighted by the success achieved in removing the allergens from the home. It has been argued that the relatively low incidence of asthma in Western countries may be due to a low prevalence of such allergens in foods in the Western diet. Moreover, asthma may occur as a complication of atopic dermatitis and anaphylaxis has been reported following ingestion of foods containing peanut allergens. These findings may be part of a spectrum of atopic manifestations, and may represent an evolution of atopic response from one type (mite) to another, with development of antibody to the offending allergen. A further possible explanation of the association of asthma and atopic dermatitis is that both may represent manifestations of a single disease, perhaps with different clinical expressions resulting from hormonal and other differences in the two genders. Finally, a complete aetiological explanation of these associations, which involve non-atopic asthma, still awaits identification.Q: Why isn't my TRG-style autorelease pool behaving like it should? // MainViewController.h #import @class ViewController; @interface MainViewController : UIViewController { UIViewController *viewController; } - (void) changeViewController; @end // MainViewController.m #
