What's new in Elden Ring:

The effectiveness of antifouling paints and salves applied to dunnage and equipment lying at a navigation station to reduce the prevalence of fouling organisms in riverine habitats. This study investigated the ability of antifouling paints and salves applied to dunnage (i.e. netting) and equipment deployed at a navigation station to reduce the prevalence of benthic organisms in shallow (1 m), weedy-bottomed mesocosms. A control group was also included in which no antifouling treatments were applied to the lids of the mesocosms. One of the treatments was a transect of sixteen 3 x 0.2 m panels of dunnage laid approximately 1 m above the riverbed for each replicate mesocosm. Dunnage was laid using a stationary mesh roller attachment to a single-tooth backwashable hydraulic cylinder operating at 10 cycles per second for 25 s. A second treatment, a single transect of forty 3 x 0.5 m panels of dunnage laid in the riverbed for each mesocosm, was adopted to investigate the distribution of organisms in riverine habitats. At 6 weeks and 12 weeks, prosobranchs and phyllodocids and amphipods and ochracean larvae were observed on the dunnage, which was significantly more at 6 weeks than at 12 weeks. Very few organisms were observed on the controls, but the prevalence of organisms on both antifouling treatments was significantly less than on the controls. At 12 weeks, antifouling treatments and controls differed significantly in their populations of amphipods and ochracean larvae on panels of dunnage and equipment on the basis of the number of organisms. There were no significant differences in the prevalence of fungi. Both antifouling treatments, regardless of their potential for reducing fouling, may further encourage the rapid colonization of eels. Treatment of both these fou
