The travel alert (PDF) posted on the DHS’s website says a 24-hour period of time beginning at 12:01 a.m. Saturday will likely result in “violence, civil unrest, and law enforcement activities” that could affect travel. It also notes that on “occasions of civil disturbance or disorder, public transportation may be directed away from populated areas or blocked, prohibited, or subject to enhanced security measures by the Federal government and Federal law enforcement agencies.” The alert is “a general warning and is not a directive or recommendation to U.S. citizens to make any specific plans or preparations,” the alert states. “Nevertheless, U.S. citizens should remain vigilant and exercise a high degree of caution when visiting or residing in neighborhoods with large concentrations of protestors, identifying police officers and other security personnel in public areas, and in transit to or from such areas.” The alert was issued as activists in cities around the world have been demonstrating in varied numbers against police brutality, economic inequality, and racial segregation. Hillsborough, North Carolina’s town manager Randall Woodfin said police there closed down the City Hall and all streets to traffic on Friday due to fears about possible violence
