Skin-engineered skin substitutes (SES) have received much attention recently because they offer a predictable means for prevention and treatment of skin ulcers in patients with ischemia, spinal cord injury, or extensive burns. A comparison of the efficacy of SES and standard bandage treatment of eschar from a human safety study is described. Whole blood specimens were obtained from nine subjects with healthy skin prior to three applications of SES or bandage treatment of eschar. Of the eight bandaged sites, seven showed a marked increase in vascularity. The biophysical data from the nine subjects indicated no statistically significant differences in total protein concentration, total cell count, or pH values. Statistical analysis using the Wilcoxon test revealed SES to be more efficacious than bandage treatment (2).
