Nor is it an iPad app. This seems like a question that was asked at the time Apple decided to cease supporting the HTML capability on the iPad. But the HTML5 capability is now there and so you can read the web pages normally. 3 Answers 3 Your colleague had a dumb idea. He did not recognize that he was missing pieces and thus you were unable to do what you wanted. So here is how you fix it. Look at your database, and look at your users. What is the user's role? You should only be creating users with their own password. If you are going to create an user that has a different password than yours, then they are not your user, and should not have a role that you set up. So, fix your colleagues configuration, they are not following best practices. That is the first thing you need to do. As for editing the role, there are three options: Set the user that has the wrong password. Alter the user's password and then update that user's record. Create a new user with the correct password. This is what you originally intended, but users should not have different passwords that you set up. ... but the workstations are not connected to the network, so it's impossible to verify if the user is even the one that should be able to edit a role. - KendallOct 2 '10 at 11:17 1 @Kendall: You are incorrect. In this situation, if you have RDS for MySQL, you can log in to it just like you would in the RDS console. From there, you can run SHOW STATUS like 'Active_connections' to verify which socket is
