Q: Why is coffeelike liquid produced as a by-product of fermentation? I know that when a primary sugar is consumed during fermentation, a gas is produced; carbon dioxide, which in large quantities forces the solution into a coffeelike state. I don't understand why this occurs. What is the chemical explanation? A: When sugars are consumed by yeasts, they are converted into carbon dioxide. The reason why fermentation is producing carbon dioxide is that it is a form of energy available to the yeast. We know this by observing the bubbling activity of a fermenting wort. The carbon dioxide drives the conversion of the fermentable sugars to CO_2. This is easy to see with the addition of hydrogen peroxide, as it results in the conversion of the sugars to CO_2. A Manitoba conservation officer who shot at a bear on a First Nations reserve in the spring has been convicted of violating hunting laws. Dawn Gallings, 62, was hunting near the Sulphur Lake Reserve in north central Manitoba when she shot at a black bear with a .30-30 rifle in the spring of 2018. She was found guilty of hunting without a licence and hunting with a restricted gun, according to a news release issued by Manitoba Conservation. She was fined $2,000 and sentenced to two days of house arrest. The conservation officer was working in an unmarked car when she fired at the bear, though her car was in the middle of the reserve and near the bear, the court heard. Manitoba Conservation (in short, the Ministry of Environment) said the violation was "serious" and that Gallings will now be required to undergo a criminal record check. Gallings was not a law enforcement officer at the time of the offence, but has been a conservation officer since 2001. But the news release from the conservation officer agency suggests this wouldn't have necessarily precluded Gallings from carrying out the shooting. "When the hunting was done by a conservation officer, there was a special approval granted by the owner of the land," said a statement in the release. "If a conservation officer is involved in a hunting incident then the hunter will be required to obtain a special approval." The statement said that approval would need to be obtained from the owner of the land, not the agency. The year in which Detroit returns home to host the NBA All-
