"Those who want this game should be in a classroom when it's playing, and we all know there's nothing educational about making schoolgirls fall in love, break the hearts of adults, and deliver epic soul-crushing blows to the tyrannical moronities that are the rest of us." Jon Perraton who works on the game with co-creator Klaus Heideger is a key figure in the history of the German 2D clicker and provides information on the development process of his game in this interview. "When we set out to make a clicker, we wanted to do something a bit different than the usual game. We asked ourselves, 'what's not fun about making schoolgirls fall in love?'" Irony Curtain is a 2D clicker that was funded on Kickstarter in November 2014 and eventually launched in May 2016. The game runs the gamut of emotions from love to sadness, to soul crushing frustration. Tell us a bit about yourself and Irony Curtain. Jon Perraton and I met when I was working on an indie platformer. Jon worked at Lucasarts and I was in charge of the project that eventually got me fired. After that, we discovered we both loved games and we joined forces to make a clicker. I had worked on all kinds of platformers but Jon was a clicker guy from the beginning. Jon, how did you fall in love with the original clicker games? I grew up on Gabriel Knight and Simon the Sorcerer. It wasn't until I was around eight or nine that I tried the original Monkey Island and something clicked. But I never played a 2D clicker until years later, which was a kind of a life defining moment. We made Irony Curtain a bit like a homage to them. It's got the 3D moves and stuff that we love about them but it has a lot of different gameplay elements. There is no luck involved in this game. In fact, no die rolls. Could you explain how that works and how you balance player effort with player strategy? Irony Curtain is based on very specific rules about what's happening on the board. The moves do not have to be linear; it's not like rolling dice for a RPG. That's one of the advantages of clicking, that you can set up your whole strategy without using any dice. As you
