After the final word he began to laugh uproariously, then he suddenly observed, "This is the first time that I have heard my name chanted from the hustings." Monday, April 20, 2008 Street Scene I was recently invited to a class reunion in New Jersey, which I plan to take advantage of this summer. The reunion was held in a New Jersey town that I have never been to before. Driving into the town, I could not help but notice the flood of humanity on the sidewalks and streets, with seemingly every woman wearing something strapless, and every man in dark blue jeans and a white, or perhaps yellow, shirt. Not that I am adverse to street and beach attire, particularly in the summer, but I don't think I have ever seen such a display in any other season. I entered the hotel and walked upstairs, to the room where the reunion was to be held, and I could not help but notice that the room's entire decor was done in a pure white, with the walls, bed, and dresser covered in blue linens, and then on the dresser, I noticed a number of signs advertising designer clothing lines. Seeing that the room included a sofa and an ottoman, I began to hope that I could get a quick nap before the festivities. But no, I was surprised to find that the reunion room was large and contained about thirty to forty people, almost all of whom were standing and conversing when I entered the room. It struck me as odd that they stood around for so long without sitting down or doing anything, but that's just the way it was done. The tables, which had been set up in an area of the room called the atrium, were arranged in long rows, down the center of which was a long, linen-covered table to accommodate the sandwiches and other food that the attendees brought. The receptions were held in a different room, at the end of which was a large lobby, filled with tables for the restaurants and other vendors. In the lobby, a number of guest were playing golf, others were waiting for buses to take them to their hotels, and while some were just standing and chatting, others were sitting in chairs, or standing behind the vending machines. So
