The Great Pumpkin it seems like Halloween and Thanksgiving are the only holidays that contain any substance with pumpkin in them. Sure, there's pumpkin pie and pumpkin bread, pumpkin soup, pumpkin spiced coffee, and it's in that list of pumpkin-related items that I find the most annoying piece. "Pumpkin scented" products are everywhere. The scent of pumpkin in a candle or a pillow can hang in the air for days after Halloween. It's like God smelled good and decided to recreate himself by pumping his great pumpkin to the sky. While I'm not sure if God and the Easter Bunny are related or if they ever even had a thing for each other, the Pumpkin (or whatever it's called when the Great Pumpkin makes an appearance every fall) is a pretty neat animal. In a study done by the Michigan State University, "Pumpkin Crop, Havesting, and Health Safety", scientists found out that the pumpkin has some pretty interesting facts, like how it's a fruit, and that it has to be picked. Because of that fact, they called it a fruit because there's a little more to it than a vegetable. When the researchers dug a little deeper, they found out that it grows on vines and that it only needs to be picked once a year. There are over 1.4 billion in the U.S. alone (yes, people actually eat pumpkins). And each one of those pumpkins (each one being the Great Pumpkin) can produce between 20 and 60 seeds, most of which will actually grow into pumpkins. If the scientists are right, that means that the Great Pumpkin or maybe that's just over half a pumpkin. Either way, I like the idea that there's more than one Great Pumpkin. Because of its size, one Great Pumpkin can only have one mind. Kind of like how one human can only have one mind, but one human can also have many children. Each pumpkin takes around two years to produce and is required to be harvested by October (make sense, a pumpkin). Ther
