Without even looking at the gameplay I have known for some time that a MOBA and tower defense game would be a good thing. Having played Dragon Front quite a bit as a tower defense game, I found it to have some solid ideas and mechanics but it was a little too lacking in a lot of ways. Stormbound has managed to achieve a mix of both games but more so a MOBA that is as fun and addictive as any tower defense game I've played, and while it may not look like it, I would say that Stormbound can be a pretty deep game. One of the strengths of Stormbound are the skills and abilities you will have to work with. When you are first playing a tutorial level, you are given four different skills which must be selected in order for you to be able to play that level. Once you have a level you can actually assign those four skills to three of your four available spaces. Let me explain the flow of gameplay and levels: When you play the tutorial level for the first time, the level will not be graded yet, and if you have a high enough score, you will get the level to be graded for your first time, and you will need to select at least one of the four skills available, and you have to do that at the beginning of the level and that will unlock the next level of the game. The levels aren't very long, some of them are about 3-5 minutes of actual gameplay time, but they still give you a good tutorial on the game and are quite enjoyable. You will get another chance to play the level again without the grade in 3-5 minutes, and once you select the skill you need, you need to be quick about it because the game will begin when you press the X button. You will then need to defend for 3 minutes while attacking your enemies that come to destroy your tower. Your defense is based on where the first attack comes from, and as you've learned from playing the first tutorial level, a lot of times you won't even have time to read the first attack and have to think about it before the second and third attacks hit you, but eventually you will know what is coming and you'll be able to stop the attack and claim a score for your efforts. I liked the fact that you can change your skills to fit whatever kind of playstyle you like, and I liked that the games make your decision of which skill you will use
