In vitro and in vivo generation of mesenchymal stem cells using 2-O-sulphoethyl galactose and its biological significance. Our study was designed to explore the effects of 2-O-sulphoethylgalactose (SG) on the differentiation of mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs) into osteoblasts in vitro and in vivo. The cytotoxic and cell proliferative effect of SG were investigated using human umbilical cord blood-derived MSCs. We also used in vivo and in vitro histological analyses to confirm differentiation of SG-treated MSCs into bone formation. SG was found to exhibit no significant cytotoxic effect towards MSCs at the concentrations of 1-20 $\mu\text{mol/L}$. In vitro, bone-like matrix was generated in 1.5 $\mu\text{g/mL}$ culture, but not in 0.1 and 0.3 $\mu\text{g/mL}$ cultures. The treatment was also effective in an in vivo transplantation model. In vivo histological analysis showed that, 6 weeks after the transplantation, a very small amount of bone formation was observed in the SG-treated group. These results suggest that SG is a potent regulator of MSC differentiation into osteoblasts and as such may be useful in tissue engineering and bone regeneration.

[X-ray diagnosis of tumors in the peripheral zone of the prostate: localization and staging]. The number of prostate cancers detected by X-ray remains rather low. The diagnosis and the course of the disease are still being determined by the determination of serum prostate specific antigen (PSA) and the transrectal ultrasound (TRUS) diagnosis. Prostate cancers are more frequent in the peripheral area of the prostate and for better preoperative staging a computed tomography (CT) and/or magnetic resonance tomography (MRT) are used. Accurate preoperative staging in combination with perioperative staging is a prerequisite for an adequate treatment of prostate cancers. Therefore, it is our aim to differentiate between normal prostate tissue and hyperplasia and to localize neoplasms by TRUS and MRT as well.
