The present disclosure relates generally to mattress construction and, more particularly, to constructing a mattress, such as an innerspring mattress, having a densification layer with vent holes to protect the mattress from internal combustion emissions. Mattresses, whether for home use or for commercial use, are susceptible to damage, including damage resulting from internal combustion emissions, such as during the production of cordite, nitroglycerin, or plasticizers used in latex. As a result, mattresses commonly include densification layers, such as an open-cell, air-permeable, solid foam layer, disposed in the interior regions of the mattress to prevent the diffusion of combustion products and other unwanted gases into the interior regions of the mattress. Mattresses include a plurality of regions, and typically each of the regions includes multiple layers. In a mattress, a plurality of layers often include a densification layer (i.e., an open-cell foam layer) that includes vent holes. The vent holes provide a path for air to enter the mattress and create a region of reduced density between the densification layer and one or more of the adjacent layers. Thus, as the densification layer absorbs unwanted combustion products and other gases, the air that has been removed from the densification layer will diffuse into other regions of the mattress and lessen the impact of the combustion products and other gases on the other regions of the mattress. However, mattresses often incorporate multiple layers of various sizes, and thus may not have the capacity to effectively absorb combustion products and other gases when ventilation holes are disposed only in a single layer of a mattress. As a result, mattresses may be damaged from the combination of combustion products and other 6d1f23a050
