"Does anyone here know the answer to this question? Do you find it difficult to be in charge? Do you sometimes doubt your ability to act in others' best interests? Do you find yourself frequently facing judgemental others who think that they know what's best for you? Do you find it difficult to know the difference between pushing and nagging, between the friendly and the intrusive? Do you wish you could just tell people what to do? Do you love being in charge but feel powerless to change the system? Does your career require you to be in charge? Do you have a role in your organisation where you are the one in charge? Do you work for a company where you have no control? Does this describe your job? If so, are you happy?" This is an extract from an interview with Sally Cobley about her book 'Ethical Scenarios: a guide to making daily choices and living a meaningful life'. Sally is a Director of Ethics at the Institute of Leadership and Management (ILM) and 'Ethical Scenarios' is a guide and an interactive tool for business leaders. "Without the ability to make informed choices regarding how to spend our time and energy, we become
