An attempt to capture the vital port city of Nyborg, the Swedish commander, Stellan Henriksson Sture, launched an attack on 16 July 1676. The siege lasted from 16 July until 5 September 1676. The city of Nyborg is on a peninsula connected by a few bridges over the Kattegat to the mainland. The strong natural defences and the town's size have contributed to its importance throughout the centuries. In the late 17th century, Nyborg was under Danish control, but when the war resumed in 1675, it was besieged by the Swedish army. Background During the First Northern War, Nyborg was taken by the Danish in 1675, and again in 1676 when the city was taken under control of the Danes and held for several years. For the second war, the Swedish army under Stellan Henriksson Sture, a military general who was to later become governor and then king, took command. His best field commander was Peder Knutsson Tott, who later became a regimental commander. The king gave the command of the army to Lieutenant General Georg Gyllenkrok. The king wanted to send forces to Iceland and the North, but Tott and Gyllenkrok urged to send an army to attack Nyborg, which the king agreed to. The siege The Swedish army arrived on the fjord Vindelfjorden, near Nyborg, on 16 July 1676, where they camped in the heart of a forest next to several lakes. From there, they advanced to the town's outermost rampart, the Vester Rampen which was completed the same year. By 17 July, the fortress was in the hands of the Swedes. The fortifications consisted of moats, bastions and trenches. Swedish tactics
