Thioguanine, (2) determine the mechanism by which this compound inhibits DNA synthesis in neoplastic cells and (3) determine if this activity is mediated by components of nucleic acids. These studies will be accomplished by utilizing the effects of thioguanine on nucleic acid metabolism and on the synthesis of RNA,

DNA, and protein. In this manner we will determine if inhibition of DNA synthesis or other effects of thioguanine are necessary to produce its antitumor activity. We will attempt to establish a correlation between the biochemical and morphologic effects of thioguanine and we will also study the repair of damaged DNA in normal and neoplastic cells. These studies will be accomplished by analyzing the incorporation of labeled thioguanine into nucleic acids following exposure of cells to thioguanine and we will measure the effect of these compounds on the proportion of 5-3H- thymidine incorporated into DNA and RNA. We will also examine the interaction of the DNA damage produced by these compounds with cellular processes that initiate DNA repair.
