Yeah, but at least in the cases of the old horror movies you see at night, there's no smoke or anything like that. I was thinking more of the ghost movies - scary movies - where it's more of a problem that you can't see the ghosts. You know, we all have to die one day. And it's not necessarily a happy death. But we have to always see it, because I guess every case is different. I've seen people die in five ways. And it's always different. When you see a ghost, do you relate it to any person? I don't relate it to anyone in particular. I don't think about it. I'm not the type of person that will read too much into this and say, "Oh, it's you. You're the one who died," like that. I don't personally have too much to do with ghosts. But I think that ghosts are very personal. 14 Mar 2015 I thought I had it. My ideal setup was good. My rig was great. I had a good workflow. And then the frets started to rub. It was a very gradual progression. It just got worse. One fret at a time. Sure enough, I started noticing it. Then the edges of the neck started to rub. Then the sides of the neck started to rub. Then the side of the frets started to rub. But, there was nothing I could do about it. The frets were already in. I actually started to rethink my setup. I thought maybe the taper was too much at the bridge end. Maybe the frets and neck were just too flat. But the problem persisted. So, I decided to do something I had never done: I trusted my gut. I put the guitar aside. I went away and got out a pen and paper. I sketched out what the saddle position would have to be. And then I dug up the neck. The saddle position changed everything. I had to change the
