. down is a typical tree on the island; it is used for. External validation of the NIH stroke scale using data from a stroke subgroup of the ECA-DARE study. To externally validate the National Institutes of Health Stroke Scale (NIHSS). Retrospective chart review in 656 patients. Twelve centers. Six hundred sixty-six patients who presented with transient ischemic attack (TIA), stroke, or carotid endarterectomy (CEA). Not applicable. The major outcome measures were sensitivity, specificity, receiver operating characteristic (ROC) curve, and discrimination. The performance of the NIHSS was assessed using area under the ROC curves (AUC). Correlation was assessed by Spearman rank test. Sensitivity to predict a major stroke was good at 1 hour (93%) and 2 hours (80%) after TIA, and the receiver operating characteristic curve was best at 2 hours (AUC, 0.82). Specificity was good (98%) and AUC was good (0.78) at 2 hours after stroke. The discrimination of the NIHSS was significantly improved at 2 hours from TIA, strokes, and CEA (AUC, 0.86, 0.83, and 0.79, respectively). In patients with TIA or stroke at 2 hours, the NIHSS had good sensitivity (86%) but low specificity (57%) at 1 hour, whereas it was good at both times in patients with CEA (77% to 81%). As time from TIA to CEA increased, the sensitivity of the NIHSS decreased, but the specificity increased, with no change in the AUC. The NIHSS is applicable to accurately predict major strokes at 2 hours and has reasonable prediction at 1 hour after TIA, stroke, and CEA. The NIHSS is not accurate in patients with TIA at 1 hour. It is useful in the ED for triage and to guide clinical decision making after 1 hour of TIA. It is not useful for triage after 2 hours of TIA. A sea of red on the morning of October 20 was a rare phenomenon in Manila. A.M. Fans — the group of hard-core supporters of the Flying Spaghetti Monster — had occupied a strip of pavement outside the National Museum of the Philippines. They did not back down when museum personnel tried to move them on, but out of respect for their beliefs, the museum officials left without enforcing the order to leave. A representative c6a93da74d
