Guild-based analysis revealed that the gut microbiota in db/db and wild-type mice (HFD or chow diet) were different, with different guilds dominating in each mouse strain. db/db mice showed a Bifidobacterium-dominated gut microbiota with significantly lower Firmicutes and higher Bacteroidetes. Moreover, in the Firmicutes phylum, the prevalence of Verrucomicrobia and Spirochaetes and the abundance of Lachnospiraceae were significantly lower in db/db mice compared to wild-type mice [93]. By contrast, the abundances of Oscillospira, Clostridium, and Alistipes were significantly higher in db/db mice, indicating a potential contribution of gut microbiota to the low sensitivity to fatty acid in db/db mice [93]. In a study analyzing the gut microbiomes of 13 lean and 13 obese subjects, a guild cluster was found to be significantly associated with obesity [95]. When stratified by BMI, a pair-wise comparison of the obese vs. lean subjects revealed a distinct clustering pattern in the obese subjects. While the communities in lean individuals were dominated by Lachnospiraceae, Bacteroidaceae, and Clostridiales, the obese individuals were characterized by an overabundance of Prevotella and Adlercreutzia. In the second study, Jangra et al. analyzed the fecal microbiome of 53 lactating, postpartum women who delivered at term, of whom 27 had delivered at term while 26 delivered prematurely. A subset of women was obese, and the abundance of Prevotella was significantly higher in the obese women compared to those who did not have obesity, regardless of delivery mode [96]. Another study examined the microbiome of 115 volunteer postpartum women, and identified a set of 13 microbial taxa that were associated with early postpartum onset of anemia. Of these, increases in Clostridiales and Bacteroides were associated with postpartum onset of anemia.
