A third crucial issue for AI systems is the complexity of the AI agent and the domain specific data collection. A major challenge faced by AI developers is ensuring that their AI agent systems are not simply a "black box" whose behaviour cannot be understood, and which may not be trustworthy in patients' data [70]. Developing unique AI systems for specific domains, or developing individual AIs for different clinical domains are ways that AI developers may be able to address this. The time and effort that has already been invested in delivering AI systems is considerable. Over the life of the product, the project can become increasingly challenging and costly to maintain [71]. All of this increases the need for adequate project and leadership management to address the many challenges that AI delivers, but in particular the need to ensure robust evaluation of the clinical impact.
