The ligand for mannose-specific receptors on calf synovial cells has been identified as sialic acid-containing glycoconjugate, because of its involvement in the formation of lysosomal-cell adhesion and asialo-glycoprotein (ASGP) receptor has been proposed as a possible candidate. Thus in order to confirm this hypothesis, we investigated an effect of a lysosomal cytoplasmic extract on attachment of lysosomal membranes to calf synovial cells. Lysosomal membranes were prepared from calf synovial cells by density gradient centrifugation and solubilized in hypotonic buffer, followed by centrifugation. The latter solution was added to calf synovial cell monolayers and the cultures were incubated for 1 h at 4 degrees C. The number of attached lysosomal membranes was then counted in microscopical preparations. The cytoplasmic extract of lysosomes (0.1 mg/ml) inhibited the attachment of calf synovial cells by approx. 30-50%. The inhibition was dependent on the concentration of the extract. The effect was reduced by removal of sialic acid from the lysosomal extract. The results obtained

It is well known that postoperative hyperglycemia is a risk factor for postoperative complications. However, the relationship between postoperative hyperglycemia, development of diabetic ketoacidosis (DKA), and hepatic ischemia/infarction after pancreatoduodenectomy (PD) is not well known. In this study, we investigated the frequency of postoperative hyperglycemia, DKA, and hepatic ischemia/infarction, and determined the predictive factors that are associated with postoperative hyperglycemia, DKA, and hepatic ischemia/infarction. We analyzed data for 144 consecutive patients who underwent PD between 2007 and 2012. Induction therapy was not used before PD. The frequency of postoperative hyperglycemia was 45.8% and that of DKA was 7.7%. Postoperative hyperglycemia, although not DKA, occurred more frequently in patients who had excessive intraoperative bleeding, and postoperative DKA, although not hyperglycemia, occurred more frequently in patients with excessive bleeding.
