Gene expression profiling has identified multiple prognostic genes in lung cancer. The aim of this study was to assess the performance of different genomics-based approaches to predict survival in patients with non-small-cell lung cancer (NSCLC) and to compare its accuracy to a traditional clinical staging system. We analyzed the expression data of 2604 patients with stage II-III NSCLC in order to identify a gene-based prognostic classifier. We developed a three-gene classifier based on genes that were differentially expressed in patients with good and poor survival. This classifier was then compared to the TNM classification and another classifier based on the expression of the gene set reported by the Moffitt et al. Study. We also compared the performance of gene expression, staging and TNM classification with the survival of patients with NSCLC, and used a prognostic index of the three gene classifier. The classifier based on expression of patients with good prognosis was composed of 12 genes. It showed a significant accuracy for the prediction of survival in both univariate analysis (p(CNN) Police in Florida say a man intentionally walked into a church, entered a baptismal and then started stabbing congregants.
