Technical Field The present invention relates to a developing device used for a copier, a printer, a facsimile, and the like, and to an image forming apparatus including the developing device. 2. Related Art Image forming apparatuses using an electrophotographic system include a developing device for developing an electrostatic latent image formed on a photo conductor (photosensitive member) as a toner image by using toner and a transfer device for transferring the toner image developed by the developing device onto a printing medium. The developing device includes an electrically conductive hollow-cylindrical shell and a developing roller rotatably supported in the shell. In this developing device, a developing bias voltage is applied to the developing roller to make the developing roller electrically conductive and a toner image is formed on the developing roller by stirring the toner with the developing roller. Toner having an electrical resistance of about 100 mΩ per 10 g is generally used as the toner. The toner having such an electrical resistance is charged by friction with the developing roller. Therefore, the electrically conductive state of the developing roller is maintained for a long period of time. However, because the developing roller is electrically conductive, a voltage drop occurs when a large amount of the electrically conductive developer passes the developing
