Effect of background humic acid on natural attenuation of isopropanol in fresh water. In this study, we investigated the effect of humic acid (HA) on the natural attenuation of isopropanol (IPA) in freshwater. The results showed that HA significantly accelerated the IPA degradation in the first 5 days, while after that, it significantly inhibited the degradation, resulting in a lower half-life of IPA (34 h) than in the control without HA (63 h). A similar phenomenon was observed for acetone and propylene glycol, demonstrating that the effect of humic acid on some organic compounds also occurs at longer-term disinfection. The maximum effect was observed at a HA dose of 1.5 mg C/L. In contrast, the analysis of species of bacteria and fungi showed that the most dominant species in the treatment without HA was Brevibacterium sp., while that in the presence of 0.7 mg C/L of HA was Shewanella putrefaciens, suggesting that the microorganisms with different type of tolerance to humic acid may exist. To conclude, HA can significantly enhance the mass transfer and accelerate the natural attenuation of some organic compounds in water, but the dose may also greatly influence the effect.
