When AI is on, your photo has different light and dark areas handy to the edges of a photo and they'll pretty much rectify the exposure automatically. It's one of those little, but handy safety nets. It'd be nice to have this option through the app too, but at least it's built into the tool. Adobe's also added Color Auto Under, which is great for users. For a start, the tool is activated by a single button on the panel instead of many steps. Plus, you can choose to adjust the highlights, shadows, or colors themselves. And with great flexibility, you can tell the tool to fine-tune it with an eye for auto intensity in large or small areas. You can also save multiple preferences in a set of tabs. It's not limited to only auto intensity: it works on white balance as well, even if you aren't expert with lighting. Whether looking at photographs of underwater scenes or landscapes filled with colorful flowers, we've found Color Auto Under to be a great tool. Just a quick note—most edits work in layers, so you'll have to create them to see the changes. It's entirely possible that you'll be able to do the same and make it happen in a single edit, but I'm not sure. One step that I'm not going to give candidates for is the introduction of Symmetry; it's not yet in the tool. Starting in Version 24, you can now view photos of the sea with the Saving from the Deep tool. These are high-definition photographs of the world's oceans, which let you search from a single point of capture to dredge up pictures of your favorite beaches.
